What's New In Photoshop 2022 (version 23)?

The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for a continuous slab casting, and more particularly to a method for casting long, thick slabs which are to be cut into slabs of smaller length and thickness and which are cast in a continuous manner. The invention resides in a method for casting a slab by feeding a slab of rolled material to a stationary top surface of a moving mold, dispensing molten metal from a nozzle into said stationary mold in an area above said top surface thereof, causing the top surface of the mold to lift to a position above the liquid level of the molten metal, and pressing on said top surface of said mold to form a slab of molten metal thereon so that the molten metal is confined between said mold and the top surface of said slab, and thereby causes the slab to solidify and solidify in thickness as it descends below a lower edge of the top surface of the mold. There are several known methods of continuous casting thick slabs of metal, e.g., steel or cast iron. Many of these methods employ the use of two or more mold portions moveable relative to each other or between a mold and a continuous roller conveyor, such as disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,648,356, 3,571,987, 3,845,849, 3,993,002, 4,005,065, 4,057,292, 4,177,058, 4,281,959, 4,366,873, 4,443,336, 4,550,721, 4,566,502, and 4,579,772. These patents teach various methods, for example, of forming two or more cooperating mold portions moveable laterally for receiving and forming a slab into which molten metal is fed from a continuous supply source and of moving the mold and the continuous supply source relative to each other to enable a continuous casting operation. The prior art, however, has had certain drawbacks in that the prior art methods of continuous slab casting involve rather complicated moving and adjustable parts which are required in the mold. In particular, it has been difficult to produce slabs having a smooth continuous surface. Also, the size of the mold has been limited. This is due to the difficulty of forming openings of sufficient size between mold portions to allow the casting of molten material into the mold. There is need, therefore, for a new and improved method of continuous slab casting which overcomes the limitations of the prior art
